Intergenerational Programs

(See also Grandparents as Caregivers and Volunteers)

Interest in intergenerational activities involving older adults and children continues to grow as the size and composition of nuclear families continue to change in the United States and other industrialized nations. Intergenerational programs are most frequently found in schools, child and adult day care programs, community centers, and with civic organizations and youth groups. The links below include resource centers for information, training and technical assistance in local programming; state intergenerational networks; academic intergenerational service and related activities; and local service programs. A special section includes links to papers addressing the often debated public policy issue of intergenerational equity.
